

PUBLIC POLICY AND PARKINSON'S DISEASE

Government policies and programs directly affect the Parkinson's community, making a unified research and policy strategy key to advancing new treatments and a cure. To drive change, The Michael J. Fox Foundation established three priority areas for Parkinson's policy work:

Further Parkinson's Disease Research

Increased federal research funding and greater resources for scientists can advance breakthroughs that could lead to new treatments and a cure.

Support Drug Development and Approvals

Amplifying the patient voice in conversations with drug makers, insurers and government regulators can bring effective, affordable therapies to market.

Safeguard Access to Care and Support

Resources such as government benefits, therapy services and emerging technologies can improve well-being and symptom management.

ADVOCATE FOR PARKINSON'S RESEARCH AND CARE

Advocacy is key to creating change. By staying informed and making your voice heard, you can impact policy.
